

Deborah Brown

Deborah Brown is global policy advocacy lead for the Association for Progressive Communications (APC), a global non-governmental organization and network of members in 73 countries, which works at the intersection of human rights and technology to advance social justice, women's rights and sustainable development. She focuses on internet rights advocacy and fostering good internet governance to advance international norms and hold governments to account.

She leads APC's engagement in various UN processes, and has represented APC at the UN Human Rights Council, UN General Assembly, World Summit on the Information Society (WSIS) and the International Telecommunication Union, among others. Deborah also represents APC on the Civil Society Information Society Advisory Council (CSISAC) at the OECD Committee on Digital Economy Policy, and serves as a member of the Advisory Network of the Freedom Online Coalition.

Previously, Deborah worked at Access Now, the United Nations Foundation, and the National Democratic Institute. She received her master's degree from Georgetown University and her bachelor's degree from Barnard College, Columbia University.
